

Bus Therapy

The children recovered from Cornucopia House in 2001 were assigned to one of the three active youth facilities in existence at the time. Each stay lasted, at most, nine months. [REDACTED]

Unable to handle the burden of a child in need, bus therapy occurs when the state, company, or school district in charge of a child's welfare ships them off to a different custodian "better suited" to meet their needs. In reality, it's a legal way for institutions to foist their underage burdens onto each other, enticing out-of-state concerns to take responsibility in exchange for the federal assistance money attached to each case file.

After their rescue, the children of Cornucopia House were again abandoned, each essentially sold to whatever adoption agency, treatment facility, religious "rehabilitation" camp, or other concern that thought it could transform a child from state deficit into private profit. The tracks have been obscured so as to make it nearly impossible to trace their paths through life, and accountability for their neglect has been scrubbed away like fingerprints from a murder weapon. The victims of Cornucopia House disappeared into the idiot machine, like the 500,000 other children churned through its guts every year.

Arnold Springs

Maryland DHS sent seven of the children to the state-run Arnold Springs Children's Home. A series of well-meaning medical diagnoses suggests the children recovered from Cornucopia House suffered from a laundry list of psychological disorders: ADD, ADHD, PTSD, borderline personality disorder, oppositional-defiant disorder, reactive-attachment disorder, varying degrees of autism, etc. [REDACTED]

[REDACTED] Most children, particularly the younger ones, were nonverbal, waffling between catatonia and violent outburst, especially when separated from their peers.

The sheer variety of care they required overwhelmed the in-house educational staff of the facility. They lacked the specialists required to meet the educational needs of the population. They soon transferred the four most severe cases to self-contained childcare facilities around the country specializing in the various (incorrect) diagnoses. Three children were placed through local adoption and had their records at Arnold Springs sealed in the legal proceedings. The facility has an extremely high turnover rate. Traumatized children often lash out: bruising, biting, and covering caretakers in urine. The reward for the average caretaker is pay barely above minimum wage. Certified staff are salaried and work 60-hour weeks with mandatory on-call time.

After 15 years, no one has worked at the facility long enough to remember anything from 2001. So many generations of entry-level caretakers and rotating counselors have poured through the Children's Home since 2001 that the only record of their stay is the transfer paperwork closing the files.

PeaceLove

A privately owned mental health corporation (Baltimore-based PeaceLove, Inc.) took custody of six rescued children. Children from this facility were bused to a local public school so that the private company would not have to pay tutors for their education. Upon arrival at the local school district, no more than lip service was paid toward addressing their special needs.

[REDACTED] each file shows that the child was later disqualified from Individual Education Plans (IEPs) and 504 modifications for Other Health Impairments (OHI). Educational diagnosis is a secondary assessment required to confirm that a child's medical diagnosis actually requires modifications to curriculum or an educational setting. An educational diagnosis must be performed by an educational psychologist. All of the children from Cornucopia House had their assessments done by Dr. Diane Daugherty, a special education process coordinator from the local school district closest to the privately owned mental health facility. Uniformly, the assessments report "no evidence of behavioral or learning disabilities," and blames teacher referrals of the new students on "poor classroom management."

Agents deduce that Daugherty's negligence was an attempt to protect her small school district. The district ranks amongst the poorest and smallest in Maryland. The only reason it agreed to take on the educational load of the private youth facility was in exchange for their ADA (Average Daily Attendance) money, which provided funding from the state based on the number of students enrolled. Despite the behavioral issues caused by at-risk kids, this deal had previously been profitable for both the facility and the school. However, the influx of specialized staff required to teach six nearly preverbal students added to the district's roster mid-year would have likely bankrupted the school.

In an attempt to protect the district from federal laws requiring they provide services to all qualifying students, Daugherty disqualified the children from Cornucopia House from special education services. By the time the fall semester of the next year started, the behavior of the educationally neglected students worsened to the point that the private healthcare provider forfeited additional state payments for each child's care and "renegotiated" the custody arrangements of each survivor, sending them to other private mental health facilities around the country.

Mary's Place

The last six children were sent to another state-run orphanage called Mary's Place, but it was soon defunded by the governor's "Smart Growth" budget cuts as an overdeveloped rural institution. After two months in the facility, all the children were shipped to housing outside the state. Maryland only knows the moves happened. It has no idea where the kids were sent.

King-Torino

Most of the survivors were shipped across the country alone. Four children given bus therapy—including Elle Gable—were sooner or later sent to King-Torino Children's Refuge in North Carolina. This was apparently due to sharing a similar set of diagnoses: oppositional defiant disorder, conduct disorder, ADHD, anxiety, and selective mutism.

The highest concentration of follow-up material likely exists there.

FBI Case 07-195121

[REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

Bureau's 195,121st case, which puts it opening in the mid-1990s, and it was a kidnapping investigation "07". The case is tightly sealed. All communications about it must be directed to the FBI Office of General Counsel and the DOJ's Office of Inspector General, or risk facing the ass-chewing of your life.

Archival copy is sealed, which means it's probably embarrassing. Antony could help unseal it, but does he really want to?
